GIVING VICTIMS A VOICE

National Center for Victims of Crime

Supported by the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation

Who are we?

 We help state, local, and grassroots organizations better provide for victim needs

We advocate for victims' rights

We are a training and technical assistance provider

What we know:

- 6 in 10 crime victims want a criminal justice system that prioritizes prevention and rehabilitation over punishment*
  - This holds true even among violent crime victims
  - Most crime victims value alternative-to-incarceration programs such as mental health and drug treatment, community supervision, and community services programs
- Many crime victims do not support policies that would expand private prisons, and most crime victims believe additional law enforcement funding should go to**:
  - Providing trainings for police on how to deescalate situations for individuals with mental illness and
  - Providing diversion programs for people with drug addiction issues (36% of those surveyed)

*Data taken from the 2016 National Survey of Victims' Views of 800 respondents

**Data taken from a 2017 David Binder Research survey of 3,000 respondents

What do we believe?

- Victims' rights need to be considered in justice reform
- Reformers and victims should see one another as allies, not adversaries
- Victims need a voice if justice reform is to be equitable
- Traditional victim versus offender dichotomies are inaccurate
- In-jail populations may also be victims and experience resulting trauma
